When did the BBC start building a Television Centre?

Work on Television Centre actually began in 1950, but government restrictions on building made the process a lengthy one. The sanctions on building and the licensing of materials stopped the construction until 1953, and in the meantime, the BBC opted to renovate its studios at Lime Grove, Hammersmith, and Shepherd's Bush Empire.

What's new at Television Centre?

Once home to the BBC, Television Centre has hosted royalty and icons of entertainment across the eras - creating a legacy of innovation that lives on today. New homes, offices and television studios. Independent restaurants and cinema. Cultural events. Hotel and members' club by Soho House.

Does the BBC still lease studio space at Television Centre?

The BBC still leases some studio space there for its use as well as ITV's. While television may no longer be the main business of Television Centre, it no doubt still has a home here and will continue to be the historical center of BBC Television if only in spirit.
